Andrew Moore is Associate Professor in Philosophy at the University of Otago. His research and teaching is in ethics, and in related issues in practical ethics, political philosophy, philosophy of mind, and public philosophy.

This seminar focuses on reasons of well-being generated by one's relations to worldly entities bigger than oneself, such as certain groups, traditions, practices, etc., of which one is a member or a part. Examples might include humanity, music, Australasians, philosophy, and complex life on earth.

The paper considers whether such entities bigger-than-me can themselves be subjects of well-being, and whether one's relations to such entities can generate for one significant reasons of well-being. Issues of this sort have been widely discussed in theological settings, but less so in philosophical settings.
