

Kant and the Divine (a Retrospective)

An online lecture with Professor Christopher Insole

4 June 2020 at 5:00-6:30pm (Melbourne) / 8:00-9:30am (London)

RSVP is necessary Lecture will be held via Zoom. If you wish to attend, please contact Benjamin DeSpain (benjamin.despain@acu.edu.au), and then you will receive an invitation, password, and a copy of the pre-circulated paper.

Please note the time and date for the lecture, and be sure to check your Zoom invitation, which will automatically convert the time to your time zone.

Summary With the recent publication of his third book on Kant, Kant and the Divine: From Contemplation to the Moral Law (OUP, 2020), Chris Insole offers a review and retrospective of his research as a whole, and what possibilities and opportunities he sees for future work in philosophy and theology. For Insole Kant is neither a Christian nor an atheist, but something else: a philosopher who believes in the divine.

Professor Insole is Professor of Philosophical Theology and Ethics at the University of Durham, and Professorial Fellow at the Australian Catholic University.

He has published extensively on realism and anti-realism, the relationship between theology, metaphysics, and political philosophy, and on the thought of Immanuel Kant. His books include two major studies on Kant (Oxford, 2013 and 2020). Since 2016, his research has moved into a more contemporary and constructive direction by engaging with the category of natural theology, including the possibility of re-conceiving natural theology as a type of negative theology.